INSTITUTE OF AFRICAN STUDIES
UNIVERSITY OF IBADAN

Ayo Adeduntan and
Omotayo Omitola

The Digital Archive of Sound and Vision housed by the Institute of African Studies at the University of Ibadan offers a diverse and fascinating collection of indigenous wisdom that will interest scholars and the general public. Ayo Adeduntan and Omotayo Omitola, the curators of this archive, have done an incredible job of organizing and classifying the many items in the catalogue and contextualizing how they relate to African thought, history, legal studies, and culture. This collection makes a truly significant contribution to African Studies, and I anticipate many scholarly works emerging from this archive. Thoughtful engagement with these sources will certainly reveal new and groundbreaking insights about religion, indigenous cosmology, and ethics in the African tradition.

The Catalogue of the Digital Archive of Sound and Vision challenges the western notion that archives contain only written texts or pictures and thus expands our understanding of the archive to include digital sources. I am particularly impressed by the rich collection of Ifá sources, such as recitations and explications that speak to Yoruba spirituality, philosophy, and healing practices. In the Ifá tradition, this archive is an invitation to Africanists and scholars of all disciplines to see these digital sources as epistemological resources constituting an open ended and ever-expanding body of knowledge.

This catalogue affirms the University of Ibadan status as a leader in African studies and archival research. Adeduntan and Omitola's work is a testament to the relevance of African cosmology and the power of the archive. Anyone who spends time going through this archive will appreciate not only the wide array of sources but also the depth of this collection. It is a truly a tour de force in archival collection and African epistemology.

DIGITAL ARCHIVAL TURN: GOING FORWARD INTO THE PAST

Introduction

Indigenous African thought in its many generic and cultural forms had visioned the archive as a creative and discursive practice centuries ahead of Michel Foucault, the most advertised modern philosopher of power and knowledge. In just one instance, Ifá (or Afá, Èfá or Fá), an indigenous knowledge and archival form across West Africa and her diaspora, embeds capacious and infinite corpora of texts that speak of the past, the present and the future. Even as it sits partly within the threshold of the sacred, the system enables a practice of production and interpretation that does not insist on textual closure or fixity. Ifá's well-wrought dependence on thousands of exegetes, whose human memory can only retain few of the hundreds of texts, frees its archive from tyranny of finitude. Texts that are apt and attentive to the contemporary, show up from time to time even as they are held to be prophetic and of ancient provenance. The modern relocation of the archive from a place of cold storage to "a great practice of discourse" therefore begins from the point that it is considered as:

first the mass of things spoken in a culture, presented, valorized, re-used, repeated and transformed. In brief, the whole verbal mass that has been fashioned by men, invested in their techniques and their institutions and woven into their existence and their history. ...mass of things that were said not on the side of language and of the linguistic system that they elicited, but on the side of the operations which give it birth. (Foucault Live, 1989: 66).

Without discounting the extant evidence of script in some of the productions on the continent before the transatlantic and colonial encounters, orality had been the dominant epistemological storehouse of most African knowledge systems. The politics and economies of memory privileged by successive Western hegemonies and their African legates have established and perpetuated the formations that knowledge attains optimal representation only in writing (at birth or via transcription), and in the Europhone language (at birth or via translation). Becoming a very influential and dominant habit later in scholarship and cultural production, efforts have been innocently directed at having several oral/aural texts reduced to writing and translated in order to "save" them! The will to be written and in another language, among other factors, would later make many indigenous media low-resource languages and ensure high-resource status for the languages of dominant cultural blocs like the West, China and the Middle East. This is one of the factors that stymied the crossing over of the indigenous knowledge forms at the digital turn.

Archival Turn

Hegemonic conceptual expropriation of “archive” began from the understanding of it as “written documents, drawings, and printed matter, but not photographs, nor the archives of families and individuals” (Ketelaar, 2017: 230). Thus, limiting the understanding of “document” to print shows a strategic reconceptualization of the archive to exclude the oral and other media. In the subsequent alternative understanding of the archive however, there is a preliminary “focus...on as a process rather than...as things” and as “epistemological experiments rather than as sources” (Stoler 2002: 87). Called the archival turn, the tradition essentially sees the privileging of select archival forms – forms that are beneficial to hegemonic praxes because the latter already have a history of proficiency – as strategic to creating a field that disempowers alternative cultural media and ensures they remain in the margin. This is in addition to a more profound uncovering of the archival documents themselves as being ideologically accessory to dominant narratives.

The Archive of Sound and Vision, Institute of African Studies, University of Ibadan, historically bears the familiar transcripts of the postcolonial predicament and neoliberal expansion. The dream of African Studies discipline that speaks “Africanese,” engages genuine African problems and is given orientation from within the continent had been incorporated into the larger pan-African agenda of Kwame Nkrumah, first President of independent Ghana (Agbodeka, 1998; Allman, 2013). That singular political direction and official validation would set off gravitation of Africanists towards the continent, and encourage very robust intellectual engagements by Africa-based scholars. The simultaneous emergence of African Studies institutions all over the continent was so noticeable that William Hance and Phillip Curtin enthused that at African universities in “Ibadan, Ghana, Makerere, or Dakar, the number and range of Africanists are equivalent to those of most of African studies centers in Europe or America... We may be proud of the number of Africanists gathered together at some of our major African studies centers, but no American university can match the quality or number of ‘Nigerianists’ now present on the staff at Ibadan” (Hance and Curtin, 1966: 27). This is significant in the context of African Studies’ beginning in colonial ethnography.

In the promising climate of the decade that followed, archives committed to the collection, preservation and circulation of the indigenous and new African knowledge forms began to emerge as repositories to the primary data of the intellectual enquiries and cultural production of the time: Archive of Sound and Vision, Ibadan (Scott-Emuakpor, 1977); J.H. Kwabena Nketia Archive, Legon (Opoku-Boateng et al, 2020), and others. In two decades following the renaissance that Nkrumah’s project symbolized, a wave of political and cultural reactions across the continent began to roll back on the mileage earlier covered; emerging corps of leaders ingratiating with the neoliberal order or other global alternatives to gain legitimacy and money started to emasculate the higher education generally and culture in particular. There is a legible inscription of that anticlimax on the Ibadan archive. An overwhelming part of the collection is dated between the decades of the 1960s and 1970s; a testament to the energetic enterprise of Africanist production and scholarship of those heady years. The gradual anticlimax that followed is also legible in the straggle of irregular archival entries that characterize the rest of that century. By the 1980s, military interventions had become a fixture on the continent’s political culture. In the Nigerian case, the damage that Muhammadu Buhari, who took power by military coup in the middle of the 1980s, visited on higher education is unmatched by any of the succeeding dictatorships, until he came to power again in the second decade of the new century and broke his own record.

As the economy tanked under successive governments and leaders became more receptive to policy advice from global lender institutions to deprioritize funding of sectors like culture, the humanities and arts were in the frontline of the higher institution disciplines most hit. Infrastructures of production, reproduction and access increasingly became unserviceable, and the archive eventually went comatose. One grim feature of the emergent condition is a new generation of researchers that are ignorant of many of the items held in the archive; items that could have established organic continua between their scholarships and antedating African efforts.

The Digital Archival Turn

Before the digital turn, the epistemological tradition that centered the Western order of knowing had been so firmly entrenched that the affordances created by the turn could matter just little if at all. It was, according to Appadurai (2016), routine “to construct an idea of all non-Western intellectual traditions and resources as being weak, backward and anti-modern” (7). One of the farthest-reaching impacts is the hierarchy of visibility generated through the migration of existing epistemic order from the analogue to the virtual space so that the subaltern media became low-resource, and the dominant one high-resource. Since the turn of the century, there have been occasional palliative interventions from donors largely from North America in research and allied projects in not just African Studies but Area Studies generally. It is an abrupt reversal of the reigning subordination of the field. Olukoshi (2006) notes that this volte face was impelled by events following the September 11 terror attacks and the need for imperialist America to update her understanding of marginal cultures in order to contain them.

Most parts of the digitization of the works catalogued in this document were funded by the University of California, Los Angeles (UCLA) Library through its Modern Endangered Archives Program (MEAP). Administering grants from Arcadia to deserving repositories, UCLA’s MEAP is committed to preservation, digitization and circulation of at-risk heritage, but in terms that are regular with the Euro-American epistemic order. Our interaction, preliminary to, during and after the work laid bare a dimension of the arcane process in which “archives...are not passive storehouses of old stuff, but active sites where social power is negotiated, contested, confirmed” (Schwartz and Cook, 2002: 1). Mainly, the donors’ terms required a sort of renouncement of curatorial agency on the part of the receiving party regarding what to digitize and how to digitize them. In our case, the Arabic manuscripts held in the Institute’s Centre for Arabic Documentation (and those we intended to access from extramural sources) were not allowed to be included in the project. Also, the metadata were restricted to the Library of Congress model that highlights Anglophone contents, and grossly underrepresents the non-English signs; keywords, for example, are predetermined, and any “rogue” Tiv or Epira “mumbo jumbo” entries (or even original English equivalents of them not known to Library of Congress) are automatically “frog-marched” out of the database.

The imperialist structure always seeks to shape the end results of its charity and benefactions. There is little that any well-meaning functionaries of the system could effect to the contrary. In the three years of the project, there was exemplary warmth, affability and understanding in the ways that the UCLA team worked with ours; but the very healthy working relation – plus the good intention of the UCLA MEAP team – had no effect on the overarching structure that had been designed since the trans-Atlantic encounter to take resources from the continent by the cheapest means possible. The digital dimensions of this extractivist longue durée are now gaining increasing scholarly attention (Noble, 2019; Kwet, 2022; Letterme, 2022). Calling it digital colonialism, Kwet particularly sees the labour from the Global South in the machine and content productions for digital tech as continuous with a familiar history: “Like the railroads of empire, they design their tech for the purpose of profit and plunder” (64). While the present project may not exactly fit the “profit and plunder” model in terms of monetary revenue that Kwet observes with the Big Tech corporations, the ideological and epistemic variable implicated is still not benign. It has at its foundation the same grid that projects the West while further deepening our invisibility.

But the gratifying obverse is that the present condition has also created a vast prospect for many forms of digital alterity. The zone of iteration of this alterity, specifically in the ever-continuous production of the archive, is what we have chosen to call the digital archival turn: zone of subversive practice of writing, re-writing and overwriting to alter texts that impose invisibility on the local archivists. In the Ibadan project, the digital archival turn began from the point that we refracted the prime goal from digitizing and “shipping” the files to California and other North American centres to creating an alternative local digital archive; it was a deliverable not highlighted in the primary terms of the project. Also, the Ibadan team contested the donor’s curatorial choice that chose to exclude certain items such as the Arabic manuscripts and other items sought from external archives. While we were unable to fund the procurement of the hardware needed to generate more compatible versions of the Arabic manuscripts’ microfilms, we nevertheless, on the other hand, used local resources to seek and secure a permission from West African Book Publishers Limited, the publishers of Yoruba photoplay magazine, Atoka, to digitize surviving copies of the magazine.

Working with the restrictive metadata template approved by the funder left very little room to generate a parallel classification and annotation format that best describes our archival collection. The prescribed time frame for turning in deliverables also made near-impossible the robust attempt to create an alternative that would make the digitized items visible and findable in more granular terms. Gurumurthy and Bharthur (2022) considers this situation ever-present in North-to-South project benefaction: “Funder-driven paradigms of techno-development create temporally and conceptually bounded frames, with ‘deliverables’ and ‘targets’ of what is to be achieved through an intervention” (289). The digital archival turn however always leaves room for alterity and creative subversion; using an original alternative template, the data have been classified into ten categories that represent broad identifiable themes under which the items apparently fall: 1) Ifa (recitations, explications and other spoken narratives in/on the pan-Yoruba system of spirituality, healing and thought; 2) Poetry and Musical Performance; 3) Epic (legendary narrative performances from the indigenous Ijaw and Tiv cultures); 4) Drama; 5) Conferences, Lectures and Conversations; 6) Rites, Festivals and Celebrations; 7) African Philosophy, Law and Jurisprudence; 8) Atoka: Yoruba Photoplay (extant editions of the serialized photo-comic magazine published from mid-1960s to early 1990s); 9) Folk Stories, and; 10) Funerals.

More significantly, our intervention transcends the present phase of external funding and conditionalities; the archive, for us, is an eternal work in progress, resisting fixity and closure not just in its growth in size, but in the new shapes it continuously takes as it acquires new forms from new definitions and descriptions of it. Beginning with the present metadata in this catalogue, we anticipate years – maybe decades – of labour to engage the algorithm of exclusion that has naturalized the occlusion of our knowledge by, among other means, making its media invisible. Through fellowships, assistantships and other programs built into the existing institutional ecosystem, we are looking to initiate a more comprehensive digital annotation and indexing of the items in a manner that establishes leads to it more easily. In a world that has begun to tire of writing and craving uncanny return to orality through its growing Artificial Intelligence technology designed to speak written documents back into life, we first intend to begin by using Automatic Speech Recognition to boost online searchability. Other projected plans include automatic indexing to acquire content-relevant index terms, developing metadata linkages between the indexed terms and the audio time code, and implementing domain-specific indigenous-language words embedding analysis with the corpus to derive semantic insights into some of the archaic words. Tunde Adegbola, Executive Director of African Languages Technology Initiative and consultant to the project, has developed extensive plans in this regard.

It is opportune at this point to acknowledge interventions and encouragements from parties whose contributions coalesced into the making of the digital archive. UCLA Library's MEAP Grant funded much of the hardware acquisition and personnel. Adebola Ekanola, Acting Vice-Chancellor and Chairman, Board of the Institute, authorized a waiver of the ten percent administrative charge on the grant in order to allow us access the funds. Two senior Africanists, O.B. Lawuyi and Dele Layiwola, have been generous with guidance and recommendations from the beginning of the project to date. Ishamael Akinade Jimoh, the Director of the Institute at the time of applying for the grant, continued to be productively involved at the various decision-making moments even when he was no longer Director. Mrs Folasade Omo-Eboh, Managing Director, West African Book Publishers Limited, generously assented to the digitization of Atoka for non-commercial research and instructional use only. Our volunteers listed in the appropriate section above also worked hard, often outside regular hours, to ensure the primary digitization tasks were completed. All of these contributions are particularly invaluable in the context of disheartening sneers, heckles and outright checkmates from some local quarters.

The over three thousand files presently represented in this tentative document are catalogued to show their titles, collectors or contributors, dates of production, language media and abstracts. The component designated as "file name," unique to each digitized item, is meant to provide comprehensive information about them. A file name has five or six units, each separated by an underscore or a dot. The first one or two units, "ias" or "ias_meap," respectively shows digitization solely by the Institute or jointly with the MEAP. The second or third unit reflect the certain date of production or collection. Where the date is uncertain and "nd" is used instead, an approximated time frame is given in the date column of the table. The next unit, rendered in Latin scripts, reflects the various original recording media in which the works were primarily collected and from which they were digitized:

1. a = reel-to-reel audio tape
2. b = phonograph record
3. c = audio cassette
4. e = VHS tape
5. g = 16 mm celluloid film

6. h = print

7. i = born-digital video

The next unit is a serial counter of the item in its category. The final unit, separated from the penultimate by a dot, shows the present medium of the item in the digital archive: mp3, mp4 or pdf.
